Dos Búhos is an organic, family-run winery located in the Mexican highlands at 2,000 meters. We produce artisanal wines exclusively from our vineyards, reflecting the unique terroir of San Miguel de Allende. Our philosophy emphasizes quality, minimal intervention, and sustainability.

We honor traditional agricultural practices, leveraging generations of knowledge from our team, and use organic methods to protect the land. Our wines, made from over 15 grape varieties, showcase varietal character and regional identity.

Beyond wine, Dos Búhos integrates art, community support, and sustainability into its operations. We feature local artists, support charities, and adopt eco-friendly practices, including organic farming and sustainable construction.

Our wines are crafted to embody the land, the climate, and the dedication of our team.

Four Generations, One Land

This land has held our family for over sixty years. Our great-grandfather farmed it. Our grandparents dreamed on it. Our parents planted vines. And now, we walk it with our children.

At Dos Búhos, winemaking is the continuation of a family story—one that began long before the first bottle was ever corked. Every vine carries their memory. Every harvest is a love letter to the ones who came before.

Where Nature Leads

We don’t dominate the land—we listen to it.

Our vineyard has always been organic—no chemicals, no compromises. Just soil, sun, and the rhythm of nature.

Our grapes are grown with intention, never forced—Certified Organic by Oregon Tilth, with a deep commitment to biodiversity and ecological balance. The owls in our fields aren’t just symbols—they’re partners in a living ecosystem.

Because better wines start with better farming.

Winemaking as Poetry

We believe in letting the wine speak for itself.

At Dos Búhos, we practice minimum intervention winemaking—no shortcuts, no unnecessary manipulation. Just patience, intuition, and respect for the fruit.

Our wines are fermented with native or carefully selected yeasts, guided by instinct and artful touch. We filter gently, age with grace, and bottle with the same care a sculptor gives to stone.

Because when your grapes are grown right, the wine doesn't need much help—it just needs time, love, and attention.

Rooted In Connection

At Dos Búhos, wine isn't just something we make—it's something we share. We believe that a winery should be more than a business. It should be a gathering place, a creative space, a force for good in its community.

From the beginning, our mission has been to cultivate not just grapes, but connection:

- We support local artists, musicians, and craftspeople.
- We host events that bring people together—from small weddings to charity dinners.
- We collaborate with educators, chefs, and changemakers who care about land, culture, and creativity.
- And we give back—quietly, consistently, and from the heart.

This land has supported us for generations. We honor it best by helping others thrive on it, too.

A Vineyard Shaped by Creativity

At Dos Búhos, art lives at the heart of everything we do.

From the walls of our tasting room to the labels on our bottles, we celebrate the work of local artists whose creativity brings our spaces to life.

At the center is Contemplo—an immersive video art experience housed in our historic chapel. Through our artist residency, we welcome creators from around the world to live among the vines and explore the intersection of nature, reflection, and expression.

Every visit becomes a dialogue between art and place—between what we see, what we feel, and what we share.

WINE ENTHUSIAST

A new wave of Mexican wine is on the rise in Guanajuato, a state in the central highlands. While the area is internationally known for tourism hub San Miguel de Allende, just outside the city lies the country's fourth-largest and fastest-growing wine-producing state—not to mention one of its youngest, with 30 wineries and modern viticulture practices dating to the early 2000s.

Bodega Dos Búhos, which released its first wines in 2008, vinifies organic grapes and ferments with wild yeast to make organic-certified wines. Formerly a peach orchard, the family-owned vineyard is located on the Guanajuato Rutas del Vino, a wine tourism route that canvasses 15 estates.

At the nearby Dos Búhos—which means "two owls," a nod to the feathered residents that nest near the on-site chapel—I swirled Sauvignon Blanc with a fragrance that carried vestiges of peach. "It's been more than twenty years since we've had peaches growing on the farm," manager Lucero Lagarde said nostalgically. "But they left their essence in the ground. It's magic." She led me to the vineyard for a sampling of rosé and a lesson in low-intervention wine. "One of the many beautiful things that comes from organic winemaking is that we trust nature."

GARDEN & GUN

My next vineyard destination, Bodega Dos Búhos, sits at the end of one such dirt road. The tasting room, which doubles as an art gallery, is housed in a converted barn beside an iconically handsome white 1940s-era hacienda. The thirty acres of certified-organic vineyards begin almost at the doorway, sloping toward the green and violet Picacho del Diablo mountain peak in the distance. For the area, these are old vines, with some of them dating back to 2006, but the original vines weren't planted for wine. "The idea at the beginning was to grow rootstock for other winegrowers," one of the general managers, Higinio Aydelotte, tells me. "But the vines kept growing. So we had to do something with the grapes." Thirteen years later, the winery produces roughly seven thousand bottles per year. As Aydelotte concludes, with a philosophical shrug: "Things happen for a reason."

We taste through a flight of 2015 reds, all of them elegantly earthy: a grenache, a tempranillo, and a cabernet franc. My favorite, though, is a 2011 vino tinto that's pulled from the cellar on a whim. It's a quirky blend of aglianico (an underappreciated Italian varietal), tempranillo, and grenache, and while it calls to mind some of the deliciously funky blends coming out of South Africa's Swartland region, it mostly tastes sui generis: a frontier wine with its own grapey dialect.
